THE CEPHALIC PILLS have been for a series of Years, eminently useful in the removal of a variety of complaints of the head, and obstinate affections of the nervous system; such as head aches, giddiness, dimness of sight, pain in the eyes, and falling sickness, and have never failed to cure that painful affection called the sick head-ach. In their operation they are very gentle, and tend to keep the body moderately open, to promote the different secretions and excretions, the appetite and the digestion. Such are their sensible effects; but they operate likewise in a less obvious manner, gradually penetrating into, and passing through the minutest vessels of the body, so as to remove all obstructions, and disperse all stagnant, superfluous, and gross humours. Along with this searching and dispersing operation, they produce, at the same time, a very strengthening and invigorating effect upon the brain and whole nervous system, whereby the spirits are made to flow in a free, smooth, and equal manner, and both mind and body are rendered capable of performing their functions with pleasantness and ease. The receipt has been in the family of the Physician (resident in the western part of England) who superintends the preparation of the pills, upwards of one hundred years, and has been employed by various branches of it very extensively, and with remarkable efficacy. To enumerate every particular instance of their success, or launch out into extravagant praises of the virtues of these pills, would border too much on empyricism;—the preparer will therefore content himself with relating his own case.

For many years he was dreadfully afflicted with violent head-achs, which embittered his life; he could impute them to no obvious cause, and they resisted all the remedies usually employed in such cases, till he fortunately resorted to these pills, by the use of which he was entirely and effectually relieved. In consequence, therefore, of the good effects experienced from their use in his own person, and the like advantages derived from them in numberless other instances, he deems it his duty to prepare the medicine for the public, that his countrymen may have a certain resource in similar distressing complaints, and he is the more induced to do this, from the known failure of the usual remedies in such cases; and as it will be a satisfaction to him to receive from all quarters accounts of their success (and he is persuaded whoever takes them, will be benefited by them) he hopes such communications will be made, addressed to him at Mr. PEARSON'S Medicinal Warehouse.

The common Dose is four pills at night. No particular regimen or confinement is necessary, nor will their administration prevent any of the usual occupations, or expose the person to the risk of catching cold. In most cases it will be necessary to continue taking the pills for several nights successively, and upon the least threatening of a return of the complaint, to have recourse to them again. The boxes should be kept in a dry situation, as exposure to moisture impairs the virtues of the pills.

The price of the box (containing 36 pills) including the stamp duty, is 2s. 9d. They are sold Wholesale ONLY, by T. PEARSON, in the High-street, Birmingham, and by JOHN WYE, No. 59, Coleman-street, London; and Retail by most of the Venders of Medicines in the Country; but the public are particularly requested to be upon their guard against counterfeits.
